▶ to a large covered, semi-circular balcony that looks on the botanical park-like grounds, in-ground heated Grecian-style swimming pool and the harbor, as well as Southport Village beyond it.

The house and 3.15-acre grounds are like works of art. The white brick house with black shutters has a decorative front entrance that sets it apart from most Colonials — indeed, most houses. This particular design element is repeated on some windows. The landscaping on the property was designed by landscape architect Agnes Selkirk Clark, Cameron's wife, who included specimen plantings, arborvitae and perennial gardens. The grounds have been meticulously restored to Agnes Clark's original vision.

She also designed the circular, whimsical pagoda-style cabana, which has tile flooring, transoms, dressing room and full bath with a shower.

Inside, each room of the mansion offers architectural design elements that are Cameron Clark signatures. The formal front entrance is flanked by elliptical windows and the foyer staircase features a decorative wrought iron and brass railing. Looking down the staircase from the foyer to the lower level loggia creates an optical illusion. It appears that the ceiling is slightly arched, but it is actually completely straight.

The formal living room has a fireplace with a black marble surround and hearth, and a decorative mantel. Shelving and a mirrored dry bar are concealed behind the paneled walls. The formal, banquet-sized dining room also has a black marble fireplace as well as elaborate dentil molding, a dumbwaiter, built-in china cabinet and display shelving. Both rooms have doors to the balcony.
